

Hidden Spring

This art installation transforms a niche along the corridor into a space of curiosity and anticipation. During the winter months, when snow blankets Killian Court outside, passersby encounter an unexpected sound: birdsong emanating from behind a temporary construction curtain. The plastic sheeting obscures the source, creating a deliberate ambiguity that invites speculation. What lies behind? Is there truly a bird, or is it recorded? The juxtaposition of winter's stillness with the promise of spring—signaled by the bird's voice—generates a sense of wonder and hope. By concealing rather than revealing, the installation engages people's imagination, turning a mundane corridor into a site of mystery and reflection. The everyday act of passing through becomes an experience of questioning and discovery.
